

Les Wahhabites Recommandent Les Livres D'harun Yahya

UPI Asia Online

Le service Asie de l'agence de presse américaine United Press International (UPI), dont les activités remontent à 1907, rapportait qu'en Inde, de plus en plus de personnes se tournent vers les religions abrahamiques et que de moins en moins d'Indiens croient à l'évolution. Le rapport datant du 30 août 2008 effectué par un scientifique social indien remarquait que les wahhabites utilisaient les livres d'Harun Yahya pour contrer l'évolution :

“Quiconque se rend dans une librairie wahhabite y trouvera des livres d'Harun Yahya ; mes amis wahhabites m'ont souvent recommandé ses livres me disant que si je les lisais avec un esprit ouvert, j'abandonnerai l'illusion de l'évolution.”

Can chimps stop suicide bombers?

By S. International Publications
Column: News from the South

Nagasaki, India — What does Wahhabi fundamentalism have in common with the worldview of Marvin Olesky — the “spiritual advisor” of U.S. President George W. Bush? Seemingly on either side of the famed “dash of civilizations,” they both find themselves shaking hands when it comes to fighting evolution. Darwian evolution seems to be an object of hatred for all believers of expansionist Abrahamic religions. Why?

At least a decade before the South Indian state of Kerala became a hub of terrorist activities and earned an entry into Frederick Forsyth’s “Alghas,” I remember going to a Muslim friend’s house for dinner. His father had just converted to the violent Islamic branch of Wahhabism, and he quoted magazines from neighboring Kerala as unassailable proof for his stand — later I would learn that some of those magazines were official organs of the now-banned Students’ Islamic Movement of India.

One main insistent argument repeated in those magazines stated that evolution as a theory, and not true science, was actually a ploy by Satanic forces to deceive people, particularly students. Sometimes the propaganda also implied that evolution was a Zionist plot.

Soon the pattern became clear. Every Wahhabi evangelist attacked evolution because it is a strong rebuttal to a liberal interpretation of the scriptures. If one part of the scripture — particularly one as central as the creation of the universe and life — becomes poetic and symbolic, then so does every other part of the scripture. Every part becomes subject to interpretation as per the inner spiritual needs of the individual. That is the last thing that a Wahhabist — or, for that matter, any religious fundamentalist — needs. Hence the fervent attempts to reject evolution.

Unlike Islamic fundamentalism, which is thriving with suicide bombers and Friedman attacks throughout the world against the secular culture, Christian fundamentalism is essentially a spent force, at least in the West. One just has to watch that old movie “Inherit the Wind” to see the last deathblows that scientific humanism dealt to the Bible-thumping fundamentalism in the Bible belt of the United States.

But now, as a counter to Islamic fundamentalism, Christian fundamentalism is again raising its ugly head. There is again a pattern here. In the case of the Wahhabist jihad, the suicide cannon fodder is usually derived from those in Third World nations’ Islamic populations who have been lured into being outsourced for the jihad industry by Wahhabist preachers.

But in the case of Christianity, the outsourcing is at a much higher level. One has such eminent theologians from India as Ravi Zacharias, right-wing political writers like Dennis O’Sullivan, and fundamentalist politicians like Bobby Jindal at the forefront of the pro-creationist camp, working to enter classrooms into the national curricula of the United States, surreptitiously (camouflaged as a scientific theory) “intelligent design.”

If one goes to any Wahhabist bookstore, one would find there books by Harun Yahya; many times my Wahhabist friends have recommended his books to me, saying, if only I would read Harun Yahya with an open mind, I would give up on the delusion of evolution. But what do I find in Harun Yahya? There exists in those professionally designed pages simple recycled lies and half-quotes of Western creationists.

Requesting evolutionist Douglas Futuyma or maniforming about the whole evolution or the oft-repeated lie about fossils not supporting evolution — each one of the lies naked down by evolutionary scientists — here repeated in glossy books prepared with extravagant pictures for consumption by students in schools run by Islamic establishments. The same schools, I discovered, also teach toddlers the alphabet through charts that say “I is for jihad.”
