

ANTELOPE SKULL

Many more species have remained unchanged over the course of tens of millions of years that could ever be contained in the pages of a single book. If evolution were a valid theory, then there should be billions of intermediate forms to show that countless species did, in fact, change. Instead of fully-developed life forms, we should be able to see the remains of developing entities that only recently attained their present-day forms. But Darwinists have been unable to point to a single transitional form. On the other hand, millions of fossils in books and on display in exhibitions show that living things have existed unchanged for millions of years. In contrast to Darwinists' lack of evidence, the proofs of the fact of Creation are increasing with every passing day. One example of this is the 66-million-year-old antelope skull illustrated here.
