ANALYSES

The Central African Republic's capital of Bangui has seen its Muslim population drop from 130,000 to under 1,000 over the past few months. Out of the capital's 36 mosques, just eight are left and out of the 375 mosques across the country, 118 have been destroyed.

ISTANBUL: The Bosnia Times — The images shown on television are eerily reminiscent of the Rwandan genocide of 1994 that the world sat back and watched; a young man was burned alive while the crowd watched the flaming body. An Al-Jazeera TV reporter pointed the microphone at an armed young man in the crowd. "We will continue to do this to Muslims," he said. For him, the body he had burned was nothing more than a meaningless lump.

This is the Central African Republic (CAR). Unending acts of violence have been going on since December last. The UN estimates that more than 1,000 people were killed in December alone and almost a quarter of the population has now been displaced due to the conflict. Like almost all other African countries, five military coups have taken place in a short period of time in the CAR, which became independent in 1960. The unpleasant tradition of military coups in backward countries has pervaded the countries of Africa, which has, with a few exceptions, almost never known peace.

The less than peaceable attitude of CAR's President François Boziz, a Christian, toward Muslims led to an uprising last year that saw Michel Djotodia, assuming power. He became the first Muslim head of state in the history of the CAR. Although the first guarantee given by the new administration concerned unity and brotherhood between followers of different faiths, the winds of separation had already begun blowing between Muslims and Christians. After having lived for years with no problems, this was the first time that Muslims and Christians found themselves in such a conflict. As of September 2013 anti-Balaka forces' attacks against Muslims increased and so did international pressure. In January 2014, Djotodia resigned after a tragic nine-month rule.

Wherever there is conflict, we need to look for radical or materialist ideas or else political or material advantage. The CAR is the world's No.1 diamond exporter. It is the mother lode of gold, uranium, platinum and cobalt.

As with other African countries, the administration and sale of these natural resources is in the hands of the former colonialists: the former colonial powers are now deeply uneasy at the presence of China, Russia and
