Throughout history, secret and open structures accustomed to manage the world have brought other countries under their hegemony through certain methods. This is often achieved through financial dependency. The banks owned by the secret structures are always ready to step in "as a helper that shows up in hard times." To that end, economic crises are generated, revolts are fomented within countries, rebellions break out and coups are carried out. In this way, angry masses are created. These angry people usually believe that they are fighting, rebelling for the sake of an ideology. But in truth, every one of them has been trained through various propaganda techniques and militarized through subliminal messaging methods.

For many, the Arab Spring that began in 2011 was a struggle for freedom. Sadly, many people of the Middle East could not realize that they fell for the provocations of the aforementioned structures. Although abolishing dictatorships and adopting a democratic government seemed very appealing, they failed to realize the fact that they were overthrowing dictatorships because this was what the said structures desired, and that this was not the way to attain democracy they had long yearned for. These struggles were under the control of the deep powers that were secretly pulling the wires behind the scenes. Therefore, those people always remained under the yoke of the said powers, and they have never been allowed to attain democracy.

The 6th year of the Syrian war marked a gradual increase in the number of those who realized the truth. The deep powers made schemes over the nations of the Middle East, and Syria was still suffering its consequences. This is why the three foresightful, independent countries of the region, which had seen through this scheme, coming together for the issue of Syria was vital, and this was a necessity we had repeatedly mentioned in various columns since the outbreak of the Syrian issue.

Russia's prominent daily English newspaper Pravda published Harun Yahya's article "Syria is one step closer to peace " February 03th 2017.
